

Digital Literacy Session: “From the eyes of a volunteer...”

While I was spending my summer vacation doing my class VII holiday home work and pursuing sports, I got the opportunity to participate in the Digital Literacy program organized at Newgen Software. I was extremely excited to be a part of this session, as I was told that young children were taught how to use Tablets.

On the first day there were a group of 12 children and they were taught how to browse in an iPad and find information through Google. While the instructor explained the features of the iPad, I went to each group to resolve any challenges they faced while browsing. I really enjoyed volunteering for this session and decided to participate in the upcoming sessions as well.

The next day, the children were taught how to write on a word document like they write on a paper. Gradually they were also taught how to use Excel and PowerPoint. These sessions proved extremely valuable for me, as I also got to learn some new things. The time spent with these bright children was extremely memorable and I look forward to many more such sessions.
